Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: . . . pink, with gold upon it; a cap for a raisin--a cap such as he had never seen. When his father placed it on his head, no words would come, but his eyes grew larger than ever, and his poor little body trembled. The cap was his magic cap, ushering him into a new world, in which imagination had a chance. It was more often in his hot little hands than on his head--a wonder to be twirled and admired. At last they reached Mysore. Here, full as the high road had been, men were packed like grain in a granary, and all the quaint bazaar streets were crowded with an excited, chattering throng, hourly swelled by fresh masses from road and railway. There was so much to admire that Tota even forgot his cap; besides, he had been given a pink shirt as well, clad in...
