Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: .over a vast area, and the discharge frequently takes place through the insulation of the armature to the wires, thus escaping throughout the system. Very high insulation of mica and other insu 30 lating substances are thus pierced and destroyed by the discharges. The purpose of the present invention is to provide means whereby the electricity which is thus caused to charge the driving-pulley may escape in 35 dependency of the armature, and thus avoid injury thereto. The invention consists in equipping the generator with discharge-points which are supported by bill insulated from the frame of 40 the generator and directed toward the beltwheel. These points are connected electrically with the earth. A harmless discharge may take place at all times from the pulley to the points, and thus to the earth or to the driv 45 ing-engine. In the accompanying drawing there is shown an alternate-current electric generator equipped with the discharge device in connection with the driving-engine. Referring to the figure, A represents the 50 belt-wheel of a suitable steam-engine for driving the generator A . The belt-wheel is connected by means of the belt B with the driving-pulley or belt-wheel a of the generator. There is secured to t he generator or supported 55 therefrom a plate, C, provided with dischargepoints c, which extend toward the edge of the pulley or belt-wheel a . This plate is insulated from the generator, but electrically connected with the earth or with the engine A. 60...
